

Ancient Civilizations of North America

Three groups dominate the oldest period of North American prehistory:

The Hohokam

The Anasazi

The Mound Builders
the Adena
the Hopewell
the Mississippians

Mogollon Culture: Who were they?

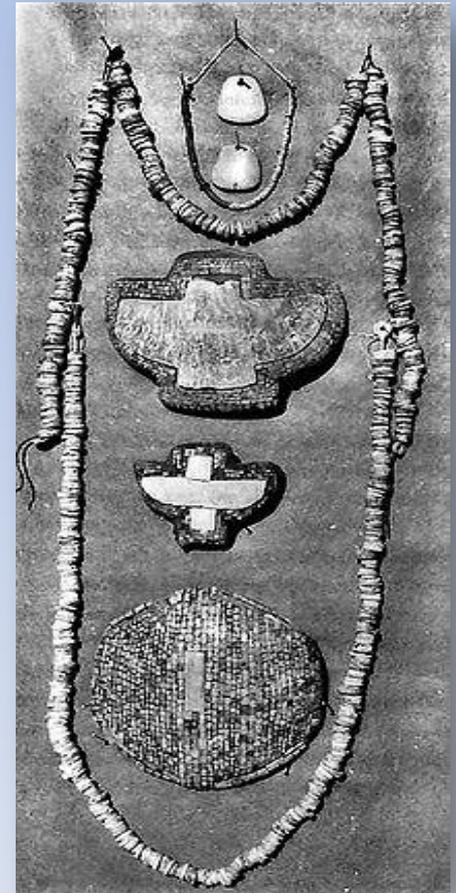

Farmers who lived in rocky cliffs or villages on high plateaus where their crops could be observed.

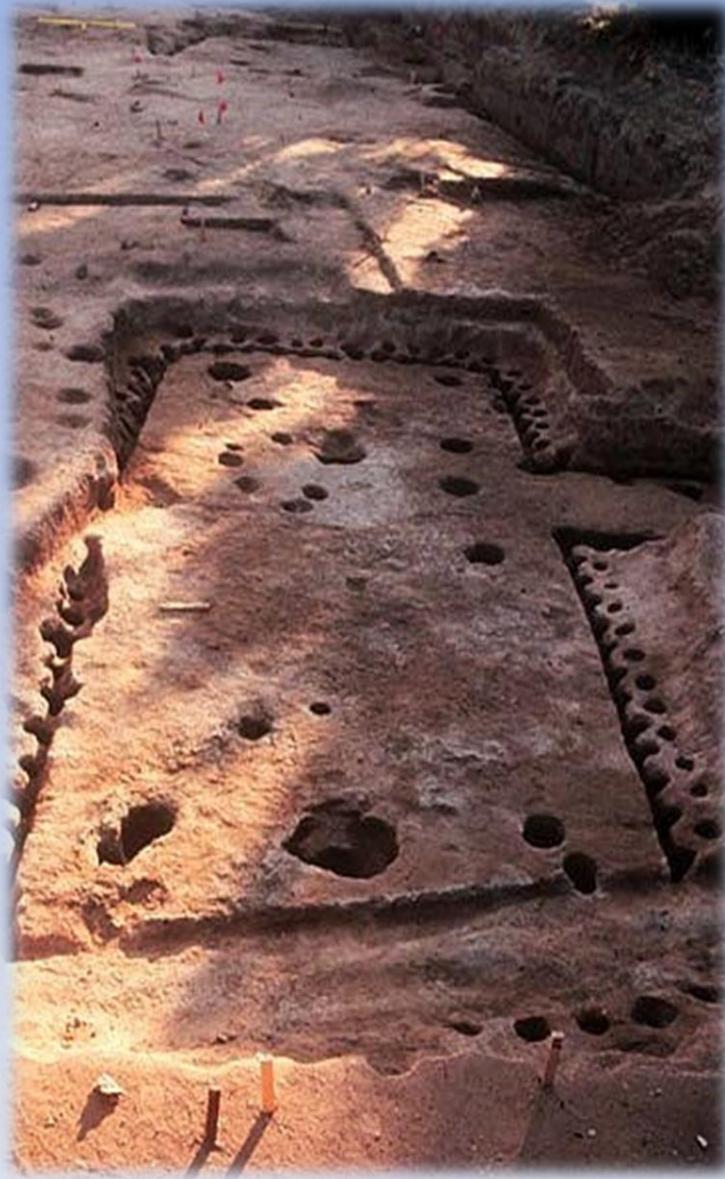

They added products of their hunting and fruit gathering to their crops.

Their culture show some similarities with cultures known as Honokam and Anasazi who lived in the same area almost during the same period.

The Hohokam

- ❑ Possibly originally from Mexico, they built dense sets of adobe houses.
- ❑ They are distinguished by the shape of the public buildings of the largest sites.
- ❑ The evidence of ball games and the platforms they constructed are proof of their unique beliefs and communal Hohokam rituals.

The Hohokam were expert farmers of the desert.

With simple tools they developed a system of irrigation canals that stretched between the Gila and Salt rivers, supplying water to their many crops in the arid desert.

Casa Grande is an example of architecture of the largest Hohokam community in the midst of the Gila River Valley.

The most abundant remains of the ancient Hohokams are fragments of cream or brown ceramic with red paint designs, carved stones and snail and shells worked with acid.

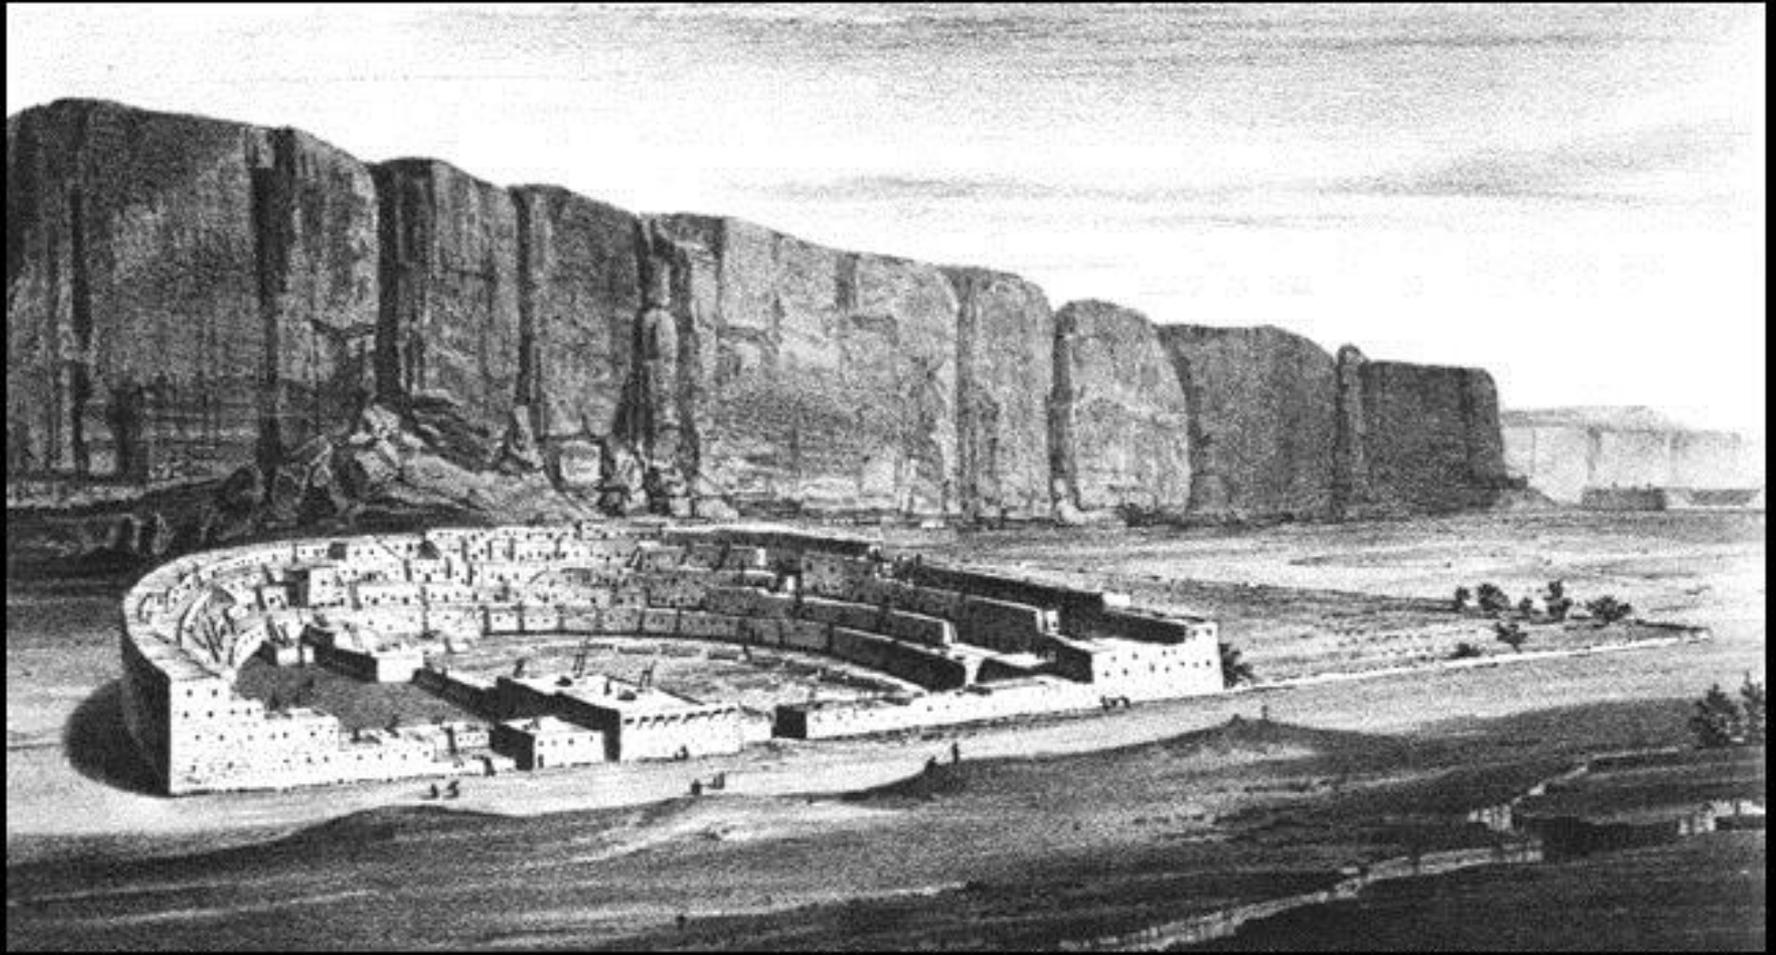

The Anazazi

- ❑ They lived in the region called "Four Corners", by the confluence of four States: Arizona, Utah, Colorado and New Mexico.
- ❑ Anasazi is a Navajo word meaning "ancient people who are not us".
- ❑ They constructed buildings without support of up to five stories high, containing kivas or ceremonial burial chambers inside.
- ❑ One of the structures in the archaeological site called Pueblo Bonito, in the Chacos National Park in New Mexico, contains 800 rooms.

The buildings and artifacts found are evidence of an advanced civilization that for unknown reasons disappeared. Probably frequent droughts and killing frosts made farming unreliable.

Families began leaving the area to pursue agriculture and community life elsewhere. They also built on the canyon walls of the plateaus, as in Mesa Verde in Colorado.

The anasazi built over 600 homes in the canyon walls of Mesa Verde National Park in Colorado. Although small, thousands of people lived in the housing complex.

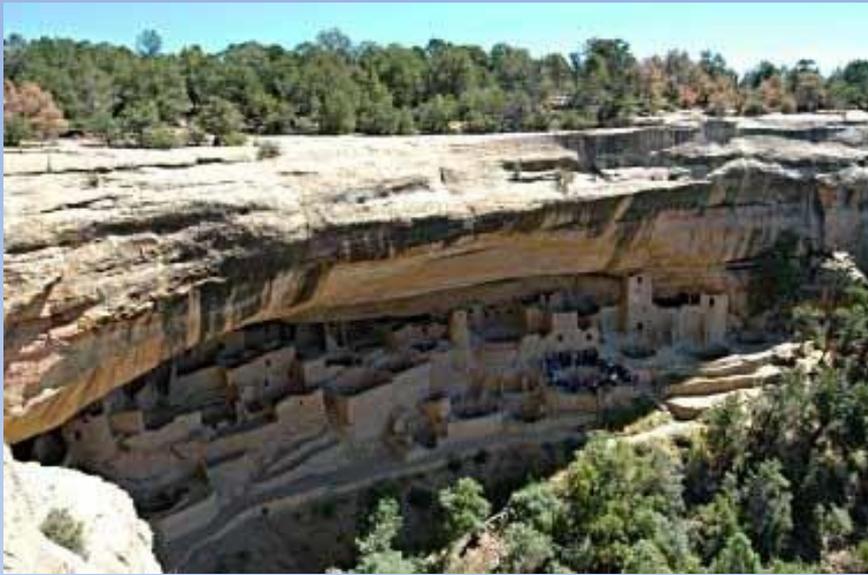

The Anasazi have been determined to be direct descendants of the Hopi.

The word "Anasazi" is also used to describe the ancestors of the current Pueblo peoples of the Four Corners Region.

Why did the Anasazi disappear?

Rains ceased, and with them the crops that fed them, forcing its people to abandon the complex. The Anasazi abandoned the Chaco Canyon because it did not serve them to survive.

Mound Builders

- ❑ They lived between Pennsylvania and the Mississippi valley between 1000 B.c. and 600 A.d.
- ❑ They built mounds of stone similar to the Mayan and Aztec pyramids with burial chambers inside and religious temples on top.
- ❑ The mounds were built on burial sites and contained many artifacts of the indigenous culture.
- ❑ There were three main groups:
the Adena,
the Hopewell
the Mississippians

The Adena

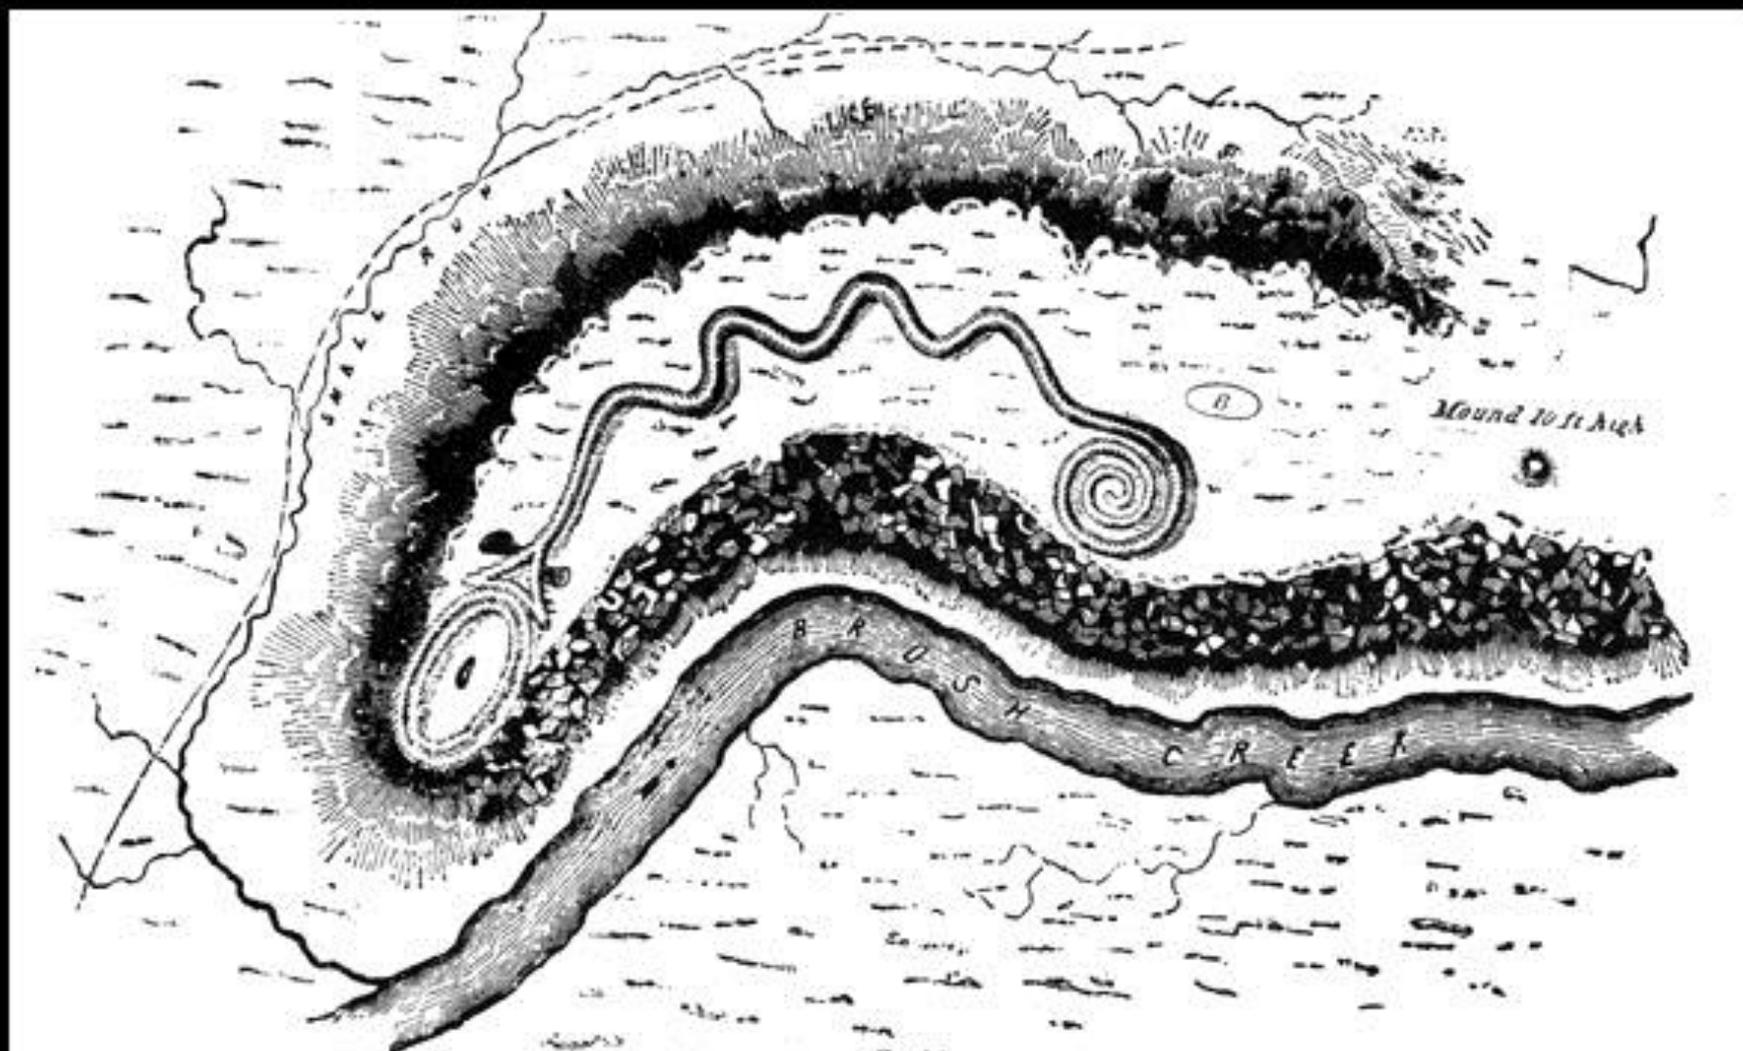

- ❑ They were hunters and gatherers in the Ohio region and lived between 1000 A.d. and 800 A.d.
- ❑ Its population was very tall. There are fossils of women and men measuring nearly seven feet tall.
- ❑ Mounds were built of mud without using tools and some measuring 20 to 300 feet in diameter.
- ❑ They lived in smaller social groups and built large circular houses.

The mounds were monuments that claimed authority over the environment. The most famous is the Mound of the Great Serpent that coils and twists along 400 meters at the top of a slope in Ohio.

The Hopewell

- ❑ They lived between 200 BC and 500 AD in the territory of Ohio and the Illinois Center.
- ❑ They built near the rivers conical mounds of earth with walls made of mud. Some came to 65 feet in height.
- ❑ The mounds had pyramidal forms and animals like snakes, eagles, foxes, bears, moose and bison could be seen on their tops.

They were craftsmen who worked stone, mica, silver, snails, pearls, shark teeth and other materials, which they turned into clothes, necklaces and ceremonial ornaments which were sold to other towns by an extensive roads system built to link all settlements together.

Many decorative pieces and clothing which express a high religious sense were found in the mounds,.

The Mississippians

Their culture lasted until 1300 A.D.

Its territory stretched from the Mississippi River Valley to Alabama, Georgia and the Florida peninsula.

They built the tallest structure in North America, the Monk's Mound in Cahokia, Illinois.

They built large circles of Cedar poles to make astronomical observations.

They were very skilled as hunters with the bow and arrow.

The Falcon and the Jaguar were common symbols in their art, and are related to some cultural groups of Mexico, which they probably copied.

The civilizations of the Hohokam, the Anasazi and the Mounds Builders gradually disappeared. In their place other cultures appeared that developed lifestyles adapted to their environment.

At the arrival of the first Europeans, North America was home to hundreds of different tribal societies.
